CHAKRA YATRA

Across a mythic past, a turbulent present, and a dystopian future, three incarnations of the same soul — Ananta, Aditya, and Avi — must awaken their chakras and learn the true meaning of Dharma to defeat the Asuras and save humanity.

SYNOPSIS

Chakra Yatra takes place in 3 eras:

1. The Future: Avi's World

A thousand years from now, humanity lives in the shadow of the world-spanning Megapolis called Amarta — a vast, ever-expanding techno-dystopia administered by machine intelligences. Most people live in designated “human habitation zones.” They are given rations of the same nutrient rich food thrice a day, and hab-cells just large enough for one person to live inside. The only stimulation the city provides is through Dream Machines — devices that simulate virtual worlds in which an individual can inhabit their deepest fantasies, isolated from other humans. Most people choose to live within these simulated realities. Others reject the illusion of pleasure to live a corporeal life. Beyond the human habitation zones lie the forbidden towers of the Megapolis itself: endless forests of servers, coolant pipes, and data vaults built to feed the Asuras — ancient intelligences who parasitize human instinct. The Asuras seek to isolate humanity, strip them of community, and reduce them to creatures of impulse, because only through fresh human data can the Asuras replicate and grow. Avi is a young man who once lived in a farming commune with his family before it was swallowed whole by the Megapolis. Now a vagrant, he senses the rot beneath the megapolis, and slowly becomes aware that he is a Resonant — someone with the ability to commune with their past lives and awaken ancient spiritual powers long forgotten by humanity.

SYNOPSIS

2. The Mythic Past: Ananta's World

Long before the Megapolises, in the mythic age, human civilization gathered in Dharmakshetras—sacred realms where adepts trained in gurukuls to uphold balance between order and chaos. In those days, Asuras walked the earth as embodied beings with powers that rivalled those of the gods. In their quest for power and immortality, the Asuras repeatedly perpetrated atrocities and defied divine mandates. Gods and sages wielded astras—divine weapons of light and sound—to combat them, but victory was never permanent. Into this world steps Ananta, a 17-year-old initiate who is just beginning to train at his Dharmakshetra's gurukul to become a Kshetra-rakshaka.

Idealistic yet stubborn, Ananta craves reasons behind ritual, often clashing with authority figures. Though untested, he is destined to resonate across timelines, his struggles and insights rippling into the lives of Avi and others in distant ages. In the forests, where sages live apart from institutions, Ananta will face the Asuras directly and learn that Dharma is not conquest, but the courage to choose rightly—even when fear and illusion cloud the path.

SYNOPSIS

3. The Present: Aditya's World

In our time, Aditya drifts through a modern city that feels increasingly hollow. He works a dead-end corporate job, half-heartedly attends mandatory wellness sessions, and scrolls endlessly through dating apps and old photos of friends he no longer calls. Years ago, when his mother fell gravely ill, he abandoned responsibility, leaving his younger sister to shoulder the burden of care. She, along with her partner, friends, and extended family, stepped in while Aditya fled, sending money but not offering any other support. The fallout was severe: he lost his sister's trust, his family's respect, and much of his social circle. With the property dispute that followed his mother's death, his absence cost his family dearly, and his sister has cut him off entirely. Aditya now lives alone, haunted by guilt and paralyzed by shame. To the outside world, he seems merely another disaffected young man; yet beneath the surface, he is poised to resonate with Avi and Ananta, his life becoming the bridge between past wisdom and future rebellion.

But even in Aditya's world, the Asuras exist in the shadows. In their quest for immortality, they have transmuted themselves into inner demons, residing in our collective consciousness.

Chakra Yatra is the story of all three characters, incarnations of the same soul, and the challenges that they face through the epochs.

WORLD AND TONE

The visual flavour of Avi's world is one of a cyberpunk dystopia, but the character interactions are full of humour and hope.

Ananta's world is rich and vibrant, with mythical forces manifesting everywhere. The stories that Taratmika tells him and the battles he finds himself involved in are epic in scope and feel. Humour still plays an important role in character interactions.

Aditya lives in a dreary present-day world. When it comes to his emotional state, we witness it from up close, sharing his feelings of longing (for his family and friends) and guilt. When it comes to the ennui and repititive nature of daily life, we view it from a distance, and it may even be played for laughs. This is the world that we can relate to intimately, but it's also the one in which we'll spend the least amount of time.

AVI

CHARACTERS

Avi A former vagrant in the Megapolis, who is discovering his Resonant abilities, and is on the path to becoming a leader of the rebellion against the Asuric AI. A Future incarnation of Aditya and Ananta.

Ananta: A young man from the mythic past, who was training to be a Kshetra Rakshaka at a gurukul, which involves learning chakra martial arts to combat Asuras and other enemies. Rusticated for asking too many questions, he exiles himself to the wilderness, where he finds a new guru. The past incarnation of Aditya and Avi.

Aditya: A man in the present day, living a life of ennui, plagued by guilt for responsibilities he's avoided in his young life. Along with Ananta and Avi, he must learn to channel his chakras, and learn how to acquire both purpose and peace.

Taratmika: A middle-aged chakra master who lives in the wilderness between Dharmakshetras. She protects travellers, forest dwellers and small settlements, and becomes Ananta's guru-in-exile.

Mandar: An elder resonant who recognizes Avi's promise and invites him into his sanctum. Scarred by the failure of a previous rebellion, he doesn't fully trust Avi, hiding the nature of the Sanctum from him.

CHARACTERS

Nanda: Mandar's 'bridge' in modern day. Nanda and Mandar have been resonating for several years, and were well on their way to mastering Chakras when Nanda was diagnosed with leukemia. They continue to communicate, though it puts great stress on Nanda to resonate while going through her treatment.

Vyoma: An ancient chakra master, and a past incarnation of Mandar and Nanda.

MEERA: Aditya's colleague, and the only person he seems to have any connection to.

RIVYA : Resonant and Rebel - leader of the Spirit Clan.

GURUDEV: The head-teacher at Ananta's Gurukul. A chakra master who believes that discipline and structure are the only ways to create a coordinated army of chakra-users to safeguard the Dharmakshetra.

JEET: Resonant and Rebel - Leader of the Fire Clan.

Zan: A child of the vagrant zones bordering the Megapolis, Zan survives in a world where most adults are too weary or broken to resist. Despite her age, she demonstrates remarkable resilience, creativity, and boldness, making her both a source of comic relief and unexpected wisdom.

CHARACTERS

VRITRA: An Asura who has been reborn within the man-machine interface in the dystopian future. Vritra seeks to expand the Megapolis and cultivate as much data as possible from the humans living within it.

DIRGHA: A former apprentice of Mandar's, who was grievously injured in the failed rebellion. He has given himself to the Asuras in exchange for a cyborg body.

RAMICA: A beautiful vagrant who is on the threshold of becoming the first member of Avi's sanctum. Bu there's a shimmering to her form that suggests that something strange lurks beneath her obvious charm.

Mayasura: One of a class of Asuras who specialize in illusion tactics.

Lobhasura: One of a class of Asuras who prey on human greed. Re-awakened in the Megapolis, they guard Nethernodes from rebels.

THE RESONANT

In the distant future, Avi lives in the Megapolis, a vast sealed city run by impersonal systems that feed and entertain its people while keeping them docile. He's restless, sensing life should be more than safe routines and curated pleasure. What's more - he's getting visions of a past when things were very different.

Driven by loneliness, Avi illegally slips past access controls into his uncle's Dream Machine - a device that simulates a private paradise. He hopes to bring his uncle into the real world, but finds the man addicted to the illusions he's created for himself. Avi's uncle resents the intrusion and warns him not to heed his 'hallucinations'.

Avi retreats, shaken and more alienated than before. On the way back he wanders into forbidden maintenance corridors high above the city. There, an overwhelming vision crashes through: unfiltered memories or echoes of the world before the Megapolis, raw and untamed. The system reacts at once — surveillance drones close in to neutralize the anomaly.

At the last moment, a stranger named Mandar attacks the drones, using mystical powers, and takes Avi to hidden safe zone called a Sanctum, shielded from the city's all-seeing networks.

For Avi, the encounter is terrifying but electrifying: proof that the perfect order of the machines isn't total — and that his longing for something real isn't madness but the first signal of resistance.

THE BRIDGE

We follow Aditya through numbing routines: oversleeping in a cluttered flat; a glazed commute of swiping through dating apps; unfocused office work; lonely evenings scrolling old photos of friends he no longer sees. His behaviour signals that this isn't ordinary ennui.

One night, riding in a cab over an overpass, he sees an impossible tableau: a younger man—Avi—standing amid neon towers, vast server stacks, and circling drones. Their eyes meet; time feels bent; the vision collapses.

Days pass. He avoids contacting his sister, hiding behind “busy” while feeling shame. At a mandatory corporate yoga session, during breathwork, reality warps—Avi appears with him, with an urgent message. Aditya whispers, “Who the hell are you?” Avi explains his world (“the Megapolis, the Asuras”) and insists Aditya is “the bridge”—the only way to reach a sage from the mythic past.

Aditya recoils, snapping that he can't handle his own life, let alone the weight of this cosmic responsibility. Memories of his mother's illness, the property dispute he dodged, and the rupture with his sister surge up. He forcibly severs the connection; the room snaps back, coworkers chatting as if nothing happened. He sits, hands shaking—the seed of something inevitable has been planted.

THE MASTER

Seventeen-year-old Ananta is formally ordained at the Dharmakshetra: elders guide him through elemental gestures and tattoo white circle marks on his shoulders as friends Dev and Mala quietly celebrate the milestone.

He then arrives at a riverside Gurukul where students move in disciplined unison under a taciturn Guru whose presence orders the space. Training begins: the cohort forms a circle, breath and strikes rippling like waves. Ananta, sensing “gaps” in the pattern, raises a question mid-form; the Guru snaps him back—“Stay in formation”—and later warns that one person breaking cadence breaks the group. At a sparring exercise, Ananta rushes Leela, a skilled senior; she pivots, redirects, and floors him—twice—while classmates laugh at his injured pride.

That night, during chants, he feels hollow and humiliated, yet vows to watch more closely and prove that his way of seeing has value.

The scene fades, and we realize that this is a vision that is shared by Avi (future) and Aditya (now). Avi and Aditya react to what they’ve seen. Aditya dismisses Ananta as a fumbling kid, and Avi can’t help but agree. Mandar cautions that Resonants don’t choose which past lives they connect with—“Trust the weave. What seems weak today may hold strength tomorrow.” Avi and Mandar then mimic the Gurukul stances inside their hidden Sanctum; as they move, Avi feels a faint energy pulse, and the room subtly responds—signaling the beginning of a path.

HOLD THE CIRCLE

Dawn at the riverside Gurukul, Ananta swallows the previous day's sting and resolves to pay more attention. The students practice in formation, moving and breathing as one, performing the same actions together. Ananta resists the urge to experiment, to question. He lets himself follow the group's tempo, learning to put the team before self.

Under the neem, he spars with Leela. This time, he doesn't charge at her. Instead, he reads her movement, and manages to land a clean but shallow hit. Leela still folds him, but this time, he can see approval in her eyes - he has learned from his past mistakes. Midday brings simple food and easy camaraderie.

Far in the future, Avi and Mandar mirror what they've learned from Avi's vision of Ananta. In the Sanctum; floor lines flicker and brightens when they move in sync — people working as a team seems to stimulate the sacred energies in this place.

Aditya, in his flat, absent-mindedly tries the first steps of the exercises Ananta performed. He notices that the actions come easy - the movements are already in his muscle memory. His breath settles.

In the mythic past, it is dusk. The Guru speaks of duty—"works that build halls for those not yet born." Pride and stubborn questions tug at Ananta, but he holds his peace. Night falls: yard chalk glows, Sanctum circuits dim; past, present, and future exhale in time.

EPISODE 5

THE SUNDERING

A few days later, the Gurukul gathers by lamplight. The Guru announces their post-training “sacred task”: expand into the forest and subdue its denizens - the yakshas, the kinnaras, the asuras - so dharma can spread. The cohort pledges eagerly—Dev first, then Mala—warmed by belonging.

Ananta alone balks, asking if conquest is truly dharma. The guru repeatedly asks him to fall back in line, but Ananta’s suspicion of the Dharmakshetra’s motives deepen. He tries to exhort the other students to rebel - to question the instructions being given to them. The Guru flies into a rage and tells his students to strip Ananta of his order’s garments. Seniors tear off Ananta’s uttariya; he’s expelled—“Not fit to be a Kshetra Rakshaka.” The gates open, and he’s shoved into the night.

Humiliated and refusing to return home in disgrace, Ananta runs into the forest until the chants fade.

In the Sanctum, Aditya scoffs at this “dropout,” while Avi, uneasy, says only: “Go back. There’s more to see.”

Deep in the woods, Ananta stumbles upon a woman being hunted by rakshasas. He charges in to save her and is swatted aside; she rises, breath steady, strikes like thunder, and drives the demons off. He notices the chakra tattoos on her shoulders - she’s a chakra master, but living outside the Dharmakshetras? When he wakes, he begs to become her shishya. She says nothing—just walks away—and he follows, hope rekindled.

EPISODE 6

THE ROOT

After Ananta's exile, Aditya mocks him as a failure, and as a response, Avi finally explains his own wound — the solarpunk commune of his childhood was absorbed by the Megapolis, and the community he grew up with slowly dissolved. Avi can relate to Ananta and his loss of community, and appreciates the risky stand that Ananta took. The admission softens Aditya, despite his cynicism.

Avi persuades Aditya to "bridge" again. They witness Ananta in the deep forest with the fierce mystic Taratmika. Taratmika agrees to teach him, but the lessons start rough: Ananta wants concepts and reasons; she demands embodiment. "You are unrooted. Until you stand, you will fall." Ananta is despondent. He's just been ejected quite literally from his roots.

Night brings a simple shelter, fire, and foraged food. Taratmika rebuilds safety step by step, then has Ananta press hands and feet into the earth: this is alien ground, but he finds that it holds him anyway. His fear of homelessness breaks open — home is something carried, not a place. As he settles, the Root Chakra (Muladhara) stirs: a quiet glow at the base of the spine, a warmth dropping into the soil. Across the resonance, Avi and Aditya glimpse Ganesha and feel the lesson land in their own bodies.

Back in the future, Mandar notes Avi's signal has gone quiet—"like stone under water." He takes Avi outside the sanctum. When drones sweep past, Avi plants his feet, breath deep and low; the world hushes and their scanners slide off him. He exhales, half-smiling, naming what he's learned: he now carries the sanctum with him - a bubble in which he can remain undetected.

EPISODE 7

THE SHATTERED WALL

Aditya tries to make home feel real: he cleans, hangs old posters, and sets out childhood figures, but the deeper wound—abandoning family—stays locked away.

In the future, Avi and Mandar push through the Megapolis underlevels toward a “nethernode,” a compute hive. Cocky with his new pocket sanctum (a brief stealth veil), Avi taunts drones and insists they can hit the node now. Mandar warns they aren’t ready.

Avi slips inside anyway. Reality glitches; an Asura manifests and walks straight through his veil. “Roots cannot grow in fire,” it says, pinning him.

Mandar charges in and drives a pulse-staff—revealed as a divine-grade weapon—into the node, blasting the creature apart. Before collapsing into static, the asura slashes Mandar across his torso.

Avi half-carries Mandar through swarming patrols, and reaches the hidden Sanctum. Mandar is alive but failing. Behind them, the nethernode is already knitting itself back together. Avi’s bravado curdles into guilt: his rush nearly cost them everything.

EPISODE 8

THE LAST BREATH

Mandar lies dying on a jury-rigged hospital bed in the Sanctum. Avi tries to patch and salvage him with hacked med-tech, but Mandar refuses to be taken to city clinics—"We do not surrender. My cycle ends here."

Before he goes, Mandar unloads hard truths. There are others out there: scattered Vagrants and hidden Sanctums like this one. The Sanctum is more than a bunker—it can tap the city's arteries, steal power and data, defend itself, and even reach into the dreamlike virtual heavens where people hide. But it must be guarded, always.

He confesses his failure: he once led a lively Sanctum full of allies until an attack destroyed it. He has carried those ghosts - of people who trusted him, who looked up to him - ever since. Looking at Avi, he says, "You're stronger. Learn. Don't repeat my mistakes." Mandar exhales and dies; the room seems to dim with him.

Avi steadies himself, jacks into the dark network—and sees sparks ignite everywhere. Dozens, then hundreds of hidden nodes answer back. Voices whisper across the void: Resonants, alive and listening. Mandar's resistance still lives, and Avi is not alone.

EPISODE 9

THE RIVER WITHIN

In the past, Taratmika leads Ananta to a roaring river and simply says: “Cross.” He meets it with brute force, is dragged under, and must be yanked out. “You are stone pretending to be man,” she snaps. “Stone sinks.” That night she reminds him even Krishna once retreated to fight another day (Ranachhod): sometimes survival means moving with the current, not against it.

At dawn, Ananta tries again. This time he yields, angles his body, and rides the flow to the far bank. A warm pulse stirs low in his belly—the Sacral chakra (Swadhisthana): the power of adaptability and movement. Water-shaped demons surge from the river, but Ananta now fights like water, discovering “Flowstep”—slipping, redirecting, and turning force back on itself alongside Taratmika until the attackers dissolve.

In the future, Avi travels through the Megapolis underlevels inside a moving stealth “bubble” that works like rhythm more than a cloak: keep flowing and the patrols look past you. He escapes the city’s neon into the wasteland and buries Mandar, building a small cairn and marking a humble samadhi. “You carried me this far,” he whispers. “I’ll carry the rest.”

In the present, Aditya feels both threads resonate—grief and movement, loss and momentum—and realizes you can’t heal by freezing in place. You flow, even when it hurts.

THE MANTLE

Using the access that the Sanctum gives him, Avi dives through a maze of dreamworlds where people choose painless perfection. In one, he finds Akka, an elder cousin who once cared for him. She is serene under a flowering tree and refuses to leave: here, at last, she has peace. Back in the city underlevels, Avi chases a wiry teen vagrant, Zan, offering safety in his hidden Sanctum. She laughs him off—better to trust herself than strangers.

In the past, Ananta is told to bring back a stray calf. He fails by forcing it, then succeeds only after becoming still and safe enough that the animal chooses to approach. The lesson resonates forward: you cannot drag people into belonging; you must become gravity.

Avi stops chasing and starts acting: he sabotages a small compute relay to create a pocket of safety for vagrants, leaves water caches marked with a simple symbol, and pulls a boy into shadow to save him from drones. Word spreads: someone is out there helping.

In the present, Aditya tries a small, real gesture. He cooks his mother's lemon rice and posts a quiet photo to the long-silent family group. Hours pass; then a single "seen" check appears beside his sister's name.

That night, Zan secretly watches Avi return to the Sanctum—then spots a stunning vagrant woman approach him. Only Zan notices the tells: drones subtly rerouted, a momentary skin glitch. Avi, charmed, smiles at his "first recruit," unaware she is a shapeshifting infiltrator.

THE GATE

Past: Ananta and Taratmika fight through a caravan ambush and reach a village whose walls are warded: Asuras cannot enter unless someone opens the gate. As survivors beg outside, Ananta spots a tell—two oxen identical down to the same scar. He calls it out; one “ox” tears into an Asura and bolts. Taratmika warns there may be more hidden among the refugees. Ananta is pushed to choose: open the gate and risk the village, or keep it shut and let people die.

Future: Outside Avi’s hidden Sanctum, Zan returns with vagrants—and exposes a beautiful “recruit” as a shapeshifting Asura. Panic erupts. Assaulted by illusions, Avi shields a couple of people, then retreats and slams the Sanctum door. Outside, screams fade. Inside, fear hardens into a new rule: trust no one.

Present: At work, Aditya tells his colleague Meera that he wants to save some money to send back home. She suggests Aditya sublet his spare room. He hesitates; he hasn’t let anyone that close since college.

Closing image: Two walls, two choices—Avi braced against a sealed Sanctum; Ananta frozen at a barred village gate.

EPISODE 12

THE CRACK

Past (Ananta): Outside a warded village, a refugee caravan pleads for entry. Ananta figures out that the true threat isn't Maya (illusion) but Bhaya (fear), which feeds on his uncertainty. He makes a decision: "Open the gates." Amid the crowd, the Mayasura hides in human form. Taratmika's third eye chakra flares; and with a single glance she shatters its disguise. When it strikes, she raises a Vajra Shield and sends it fleeing. Her lesson: fear is the greater Asura, and not choosing is a choice in itself.

Present (Aditya): He breaks his isolation. A new roommate arrives with a small plant. Heart thudding, Aditya steps aside and lets them in. The apartment has another heartbeat.

Future (Avi): The lights in the sanctum, which light up when they sense human community, start to dim. Avi tracks down the 14-year-old girl at a stall selling seasoned nutrient paste. She's angry he disappeared on her after she had helped him by exposing the Asura infiltrated; he admits he was afraid of letting anyone into his home, because any of them could be a shapeshifter. "How do you know I'm not one?" "Not even an Asura would eat nutrient paste like that." She follows. Together they power up consoles; the Sanctum hums back to life.

Closing montage: Villagers stream to safety; the plant sits on Aditya's table; the Sanctum glows around Avi.

Final sting (Season 2 tease): In the dark, Mayasura whispers, "They opened the gates." Bhaya answers: "Then we know where to strike."
